THE STORY BEHIND THE STORY

In my last article, I wrote a story with Moses' encounter with God in the bush that is burning but not consumed by the fire in mind.

I've always been fascinated by the awkward position Moses is in because of the ways his own life's story intersected with itself. There was the story of the baby left in the river for Pharaoh's daughter to find by his mother, hired to be his wetnurse. One difference between my story and Moses' was that he was raised both in his own home and in the home of Pharaoh. In Exodus 2 it tells us that after a time he became her son after being brought back to her by his mother. In the text of the story, it's at this point that he was given the name Moses, saying it is because I drew him out of the water.

It strikes me that the fact that this was an open secret plays a big part in Moses' own sense of identity, his struggles with seeing his people suffer while he lived well, and his wrestling with never really being part of either world. Seeing this makes his response to God even more compelling. "Why me? Send someone else!", giving the sense that Moses' response was more along the lines of, "I barely know who I am, and you expect me to do something like this?"

Regardless of whether we know our own parentage or not, our own history or not, understand what our life's vocation is or not, we all experience these moments of calling and conviction that leave us wrestling with who we are and what we're about. We see one of life's monumental tasks that become seminal moments in our lives and our identities — and we blink when we realize what we're drawn from the waters of baptism to do in response to this calling to new life in Christ.

Most of the time it's not as simple as a physical fight. Our struggles come in ethical dilemmas of how we use our time that cause us to recognize that what we choose will make a difference. Our choices come in how we allocate our resources to support causes we value while still keeping enough back for life and savings, or choosing which of our important things to sacrifice according to our current situation. Sometimes charitable giving is most important, sometimes it's rent, sometimes it's padding savings, and we're at a point that we can't choose all of them. Life is full of these hard choices.

In all of our wrestling, one thing in the story of Moses stands out to me as eternally profound: despite Moses' own feelings about his worth, God calls him because God sees something in him that's up to the task that he can't see for himself. This isn't just the story of Moses. This is our story, too.

AS we ponder the joyful mystery of resurrection during the Easter season, we recognize that we're not only being drawn from our baptismal waters into new life in Christ. We're also being drawn from the tombs of our own inability to perceive our true worth. God calls out to us in the voices of family and friends; in the places we spend our time and energy. God is creating within our hearts the capacity to do what we're being drawn from the water to do — not to make it easy, but telling us what God tells Moses, I will give you words. We don't rise to our own power and trust in ourselves.

We rise knowing that what God calls us into is something for which God will raise up in us enough of us and enough of God's presence to run the race to completion.

Grace & Peace,

Pastor Eric

Easter Eggs Hunt

The kids had a blast hunting for eggs on Easter morning! And no one could resist climbing our favorite climbing tree—even in their Easter best!

CONFIRMATION CONNECTION

Confirmation students—present and future—gathered on April 24th to share ideas about Holy Communion. After considering and drawing what might be in front of us—or surrounding us—for a family meal, we discussed our holy meal and the significance of the bread and wine we eat and drink in the presence of the communion of saints. We then considered how our St John communion of saints works together to keep the “body” of our St John church working, and identified our individual gifts and how they contribute to the working body of St John.

SUNDAY SCHOOL SCOOP

Our Sunday School students returned from spring vacation on April 24th to talk about the Empty Tomb. We enjoyed another egg hunt—but there was no candy inside. Instead we found symbols of Jesus’s resurrection: linens, hearts, and an empty egg. We also discovered signs of spring: an egg, flowers, and seeds. After discussing how Jesus gave us new life just like flowers and seeds and eggs in spring, we wiggled and giggled as we practiced being flowers that grow from seeds into plants!
